

Gold for secure wealth accumulation

German citizens are still hoarding large amounts of cash. Gold is better suited for long-term wealth accumulation.

According to a study, around 78% of wealthy investors rely on cash. However, accumulating excess cash is likely to be a market risk. From a historical perspective, bonds and equities have also performed better than cash following the end of interest rate hikes by the US Federal Reserve. Investors should consider converting cash at least partially into other investments. This is the only way to achieve long-term wealth accumulation. The study also revealed that 63% of respondents plan to invest more in equities over the next 12 months. 49 percent plan to invest in bonds. And 58% believe that the risk associated with equities and bonds is lower than with cash and that inflation can therefore be beaten.

The decisive factor is the fundamental data, and here the opportunities for gold investments are very good, not only from a historical perspective, but also precisely because of the current environment. Central banks use gold as a hedge and everyone knows that there are geopolitical risks. Just think of the tensions in the Red Sea that began in November and are still ongoing. There is also no end in sight to the war in Ukraine.

As another survey (by Postbank) revealed, many people rely on cash even when on vacation in Germany. One in three people have too much money with them on vacation, at least enough to cover their vacation expenses. In any case, investors can benefit from the performance of gold, and this also applies to the shares of well-positioned gold companies. These include GoldMining and Tudor Gold.

GoldMining - <https://www.commodity-tv.com/ondemand/companies/profil/goldmining-inc/> - owns gold and gold-copper properties in the USA as well as a uranium project. In addition, there are shareholdings in U.S. GoldMining, for example.

Tudor Gold - <https://www.commodity-tv.com/ondemand/companies/profil/tudor-gold-corp/> - is active in the Golden Triangle in British Columbia. The Treaty Creek project contains gold, silver and copper. The updated mineral resource estimate is pleasing with 16 percent more gold, 14 percent more silver and 32 percent more copper.
